Abstract:

In this talk, I argue that there is a distinct, dialectical, contradiction in Marx that is not reducible to two other types of contradiction that can be found in his work, namely, argumentational-logical and practical contradiction. In order to do so, I focus on Marx's analysis of the commodity in the first chapter of Capital. There, Marx claims that the commodity is a contradictory unity of use-value and exchange-value. In order to make this claim intelligible, I begin with Hegel and discuss Hegel's conception of the "thing" [Ding] in his Logic. I demonstrate how for Hegel the "thing" is the contradictory unity of form and matter. Turning to Marx, I first argue that use-value and exchange-value constitutes the matter and the form of the commodity respectively. And then I show how use-value and exchange-value contradict each other.
